Daddy, how old is a Geezer?

Wednesday, October 24, 2012

That was the question I asked my father when he complained about the driver he was following on the highway. The man stopped suddenly and Dad had to slam on his brakes to avoid a collision. Of course, I understand that Dad would have been at fault if he had not been following at a safe distance.

A similar thing happened to me yesterday except I wasn't in a car. I was running on the sidewalk and because I was heading into the sun I had my cap pulled down and was focusing my gaze at the ground in front of me. I would glance up into the distance regularly to check out the terrain. I noticed a woman walking about 100 yards ahead of me. We had passed each other earlier as I was going in the opposite direction. Suddenly, there she was, right in front of me, tying her shoe! I shrieked and slammed on the brakes, so to speak, avoiding an accident which would have been totally my fault. She was as startled as I was, but we both recovered and laughed about how we would explain a "rear end collision" to the EMTs when neither of us was in a vehicle.

When I got home, I told my husband the story about how I almost hit an "elderly" woman. He replied that she was probably not much older than I was. To a lot of people, I'm elderly too! Gee, I don't feel elderly – which brings me back to the question I asked my Dad.

How old is a geezer? Dad said, "anybody older than me."

That was amusing. Great blog. I don't dare tell my students how old I am as they would consider me an old geezer.
